Same-sex couples in Costa Rica are granted certain rights in a few limited contexts. For example, inmates may have conjugal visits with their same-sex partners following the 2011 Supreme Court decision that held unconstitutional a law which limited such visits to opposite-sex couples. As of November 10, 2014, same-sex couples may apply for shared health insurance coverage from the Costa Rican Social Security Fund. To apply, a couple must register with the Fund and show that they have been in a stable, public, and exclusive relationship for at least three years and that one partner is economically dependent on the other. In addition to health insurance benefits, registration confers on same-sex couples health-related rights, such as hospital visitation and the ability to make medical decisions.
